Today, AutoCAD is used by 3 million users, including architects, engineers, mechanical and industrial designers, drafters, quantity surveyors, civil and construction engineers, designers, scientists, students, teachers, and others. It is widely used in industry and academia, for both 2D and 3D drafting, digital mockups and presentations, documentation, visualization, and electronic manufacturing. AutoCAD is the only currently available CAD software that allows the creation of interactive 3D models that can be viewed on a television screen and is used in several film and television productions. Over a million licenses are sold each year, and thousands of customers at over 3,500 locations worldwide use the AutoCAD application with their PCs. AutoCAD is the flagship product of the Autodesk family of software applications, with other members of the family including AutoCAD Architecture, AutoCAD Electrical, AutoCAD Mechanical, AutoCAD Structural, AutoCAD Plant, AutoCAD Electrical, AutoCAD Civil 3D, and Civil 3D Construction Edition. In addition to AutoCAD, Autodesk offers the complete range of other Autodesk solutions, including desktop and mobile application design tools for the mobile, web, and cloud, tools for interaction design, creation and management of content, and services and support for various industries and content types. Autodesk also offers Autodesk 360 Architecture, a cloud-based suite of 3D rendering and design services for architecture, interior design, graphics, and entertainment. Transport model AutoCAD Product Key 2009 introduced a new transport model based on the Data Link Interface standard, making it possible to interact with the drawings and application database directly in a network environment. For example, the renderer could query the database for 3D models of the currently active drawing, provide information about the selected block, the object's location, rotation, extents, and color. In addition, it became possible to render the block in another application, with the new API for transporting, since the renderer is not linked to the application data. This allows usage from any application, for example, the renderer could be used in a spreadsheet to calculate the delivery cost of a building project. A new survey commissioned by NASA reveals that a large majority of the world is terrified of a comet or asteroid collision with Earth, and the Earth has a history of being in the right place at the wrong time to avoid such a calamity. What's more, the vast majority of experts believe it's unlikely that humanity will find a way to avoid such a catastrophe. An asteroid or comet colliding with Earth could be as big a catastrophe for life on Earth as a tsunami or a major meteorite shower, according to the new survey conducted by academic researcher and self-described "comet buff" Mike Brown, founder of the asteroid-hunting website The Search for Extraterrestrial Intelligence, or SETI. Brown and his team surveyed hundreds of thousands of astronomers and astrophysicists to produce the new study. The survey found that around 7 in 10 respondents believe that any object the size of an asteroid or comet that would create a "massive crater" on Earth would be a "catastrophe" for human civilization. Among the respondents, there was more agreement on what kind of object would cause a "massive crater": a 100-kilometer (60-mile) wide asteroid or comet than one the size of a boulder or smaller. A similar majority agreed that any object capable of wiping out all life on Earth would be a "catastrophe," but there was a significant amount of disagreement on exactly what the size of such an object would be. Only a small minority of respondents were sure what would cause an extinction-level event on Earth. The vast majority agreed that any large asteroid or comet that would "end human civilization" would leave "enormous consequences" for the Earth, including global fires, volcanic eruptions, and earthquakes. What's more, while an asteroid or comet striking Earth seems like an inevitability, scientists are still wildly divided on the likelihood that humanity will find a way to stop it. "Asteroid impacts are inevitable," the survey reads. "As such, human civilization is at risk of being wiped out by one of these events. Although humanity has the capacity to prevent them, we have no direct way of identifying or even estimating the odds of their happening." According to the survey, the chances of this happening are around 1 in 50,000. But that's an
