The present invention relates generally to the field of interventional cardiology, and more particularly to the catheterization and revascularization of obstructed coronary arteries. The use of stents in the treatment of blockages in coronary arteries to improve the long-term outcome is well established (S. C. Chae, et al., J. Am. Coll. Cardiol. 32:177 A, 2001). Stent implantation, in addition to mechanical vessel treatment and plaque modification, as primary treatment of coronary atherosclerosis is a well-accepted treatment option (P. Faull, et al., Circulation. 97:1150-1153, 1998). With the introduction of new stent designs in interventional cardiology, newer challenges are being faced. Atherosclerotic plaques on the new generation of stents tend to produce a large amount of neointimal hyperplasia in response to the stent placement (S. N. Braunwald, et al., Am. J. Cardiol. 71:15D-21D, 1993). This leads to late stent thrombosis and restenosis after a period of 3 to 6 months (F. T. Chiu, et al., Am. J. Cardiol. 86:1086-1091, 2000). New procedures are needed to overcome this limitation. Rationally designing more physiologic drug-eluting stents would be one approach to prevent intimal hyperplasia. There is also a need for new stent designs to prevent late stent thrombosis while still permitting use of the new generation stents that have been shown to be extremely effective in reducing recurrent myocardial ischemia and improving long-term clinical outcomes. Conventional balloon catheters are well known in the art and function by dilation of the target vessel under radial expansion. By compressing the plaque build up within the vessel walls, conventional balloon catheters are often effective for re-establishing normal blood flow in the obstructed vessel. The balloon catheters can be utilized in
