If you're a regular desktop user and you do this stuff, there's no way that you'd switch from a regular desktop Mac - you'd just plug your iPad in to your desktop, safely and easily. If you've got a Mac in your home and an iPad in your pocket, then as I said, you've got a reason to buy an iPad. Another great feature is the ability to adjust to the needs of different business. If you work exclusively in photojournalism, for example, you want the best ACR support possible, along with more efficient editing and transfer. With such a need, you could use the expertise of the training courses and forums to get the most out of your Adobe software, and Adobe can take care of the rest, remotely, and for "free." Perhaps I'm not putting it as clearly, but that is exactly how it works. So much for the tools and you. Photography no longer requires simply the equipment that Lightroom and Elements can be a part of. Within the software itself, you can utilize some of its powerful features to great effect. But simply put, there are users who rely on Lightroom and Photoshop in order to get their jobs done. Photoshop and Lightroom are certainly not in competition. I believe that the separation of the two is helpful for many reasons. First of all, having the two side-by-side as in CS7 lets you see the interfaces are different. This may help people overcome the mental barrier of being able to try Photoshop and head straight for Lightroom. When you're already acclimated to the interface of Lightroom, it's difficult to try to use Photoshop.

Also, Photoshop CC will maintain the option to use Photoshop mobile. With the new Content-Aware Fill Feature, Photoshop will be able to automatically shrink, crop, and resize your photos according to their context, so that the original content is left untouched. This will ensure that your images remain the best looking they can be. To use this feature, click on the Shape Layers icon and then select Content-Aware Fill. If you don't want to use the new Content-Aware features we've mentioned here, get Photoshop CC and use the new Content-Aware Fill Creator.
